2016 Revisions to CRA Interagency Questions & Answers

Well, it took just short of two years but the FRB, FDIC and OCC finally issued their revisions to the Community Reinvestment Act Interagency Questions and Answers (Q&As) that assist banks and savings associations in understanding and implementing the CRA regulations. In general, the revisions: (i) amend existing Q&As dealing with the definition of community development; (ii) amend an existing Q&A pertaining to the retail services test applicable to large banks; (iii) add new Q&As to provide additional guidance on the evaluation of retail banking and community development services; and (iv) add new Q&As to provide general guidance on what is considered “responsive” and “innovative.” In addition, the agencies have consolidated into one final document the two separate Q&A issuances that have been in place since 2013. Join us as we discuss these changes.

Individual Development Accounts (IDAs)

Individual Development Account (IDA) programs allow low- and moderate-income households to save for specific goals, including homeownership and education, as well as to enter into the mainstream financial services market. By facilitating these programs, financial institutions are serving the community (and, potentially meeting CRA requirements) while growing their business. In these plans, a sponsor – typically a non-profit or government organization – and plan participants establish accounts with a financial institution. Much in the same way a 401 (k) plan operates, the participants make contributions to their accounts and the sponsor matches the contributions at a specified rate. We will delve into the particulars of these little-known programs.
