For decades the London Interbank Offered Rate (LIBOR) has been a popular reference rate for commercial loans, residential mortgages, derivatives and swaps, as well as other credit instruments. However, due to past abuses in the manipulation and reporting of LIBOR rates, it is expected that LIBOR will soon either no longer be published or will soon become a poor benchmark on which to base interest rates. Therefore, the banking industry is preparing to move away from LIBOR and use alternative indices.

Lenders should have already begun to transition legacy loan agreements and other financial contracts to a successor index or indices. Fallback language that is currently found in many loan agreements, promissory notes and other contracts may be insufficient to protect a financial institution from disputes or litigation regarding successor indices.

We will discuss the various approaches and contractual language that should be considered. Lenders should also inventory the number and dollar amount of existing contracts that pose these contractual issues and develop a program addressing how to move these contracts to the new preferred indices. In this presentation, we will discuss the strategies and planning around this major effort.

HIGHLIGHTS:

- Efforts of the Alternative Reference Rates Committee (ARRC)
- Alternatives to LIBOR and the need for adjustments to the spread or margin
- Need for adequate fallback language
- The regulators' guidance and expectations in terms of transitioning away from LIBOR
- Elements of a LIBOR transition plan
